PARIS, July 22.

THE duke de Fronlac marshal Richelieu's fleet, sailed by here on friday in the night from Marseilles, bringing Commodore Saint-Croix to the king, the long expected news of the surrender of fort St. Philip the 28th of last month. As this nobleman was dispatched immediately after the event, and did not stay here, we have not yet received the particulars of this affair, but expect them in a day or two by a second courier. All that is publickly known is, that the marshal, who's design was to leave his men as much as possible, being informed by M. de la Galissonniere, that admiral Byng was coming back to throw fresh troops into the place, was resolved to hasten the attack, and accordingly made different allarms at several of the outworks, from which some mines were sprung, which killed 6 or 700 men; that on withstanding this, those works were taken sword in hand, and that then the governor hung out a white flag, and desired a parley to capitulate; that only 12 were granted him, and that having no succours, he surrendered the place. It's added, that all military honours were granted to Mr. Blakeney, and that the garrison were made prisoners of war. It is easy to judge how agreeable this news was to every body here, who began to be under apprehensions for the success of that enterprize.

Our army on Minorca had received on the 18th, 32 24 pounders which were sent from Antibes by M. de Vallieres, inspector general of the artillery of France, for our post for Minorca 8 days ago, accompanied by several engineers.

LONDON, JULY 20.

THE substance of the relation, which Mr. d'Abreu, the Spanish minister, received on wednesday morning by an express from Paris, was to the following purport: On the 20th of June the French made an attempt to storm the fort in 6 different places, which they continued with the utmost fury the whole day. The next morning, being ready to begin a general storm, ma'shal Richelieu sent word to Governor Blakeney for the last time, that if he still refused to capitulate, every person in the place should, in case of conquest, inevitably be put to the sword. Blakeney asked 24 hours to bury his dead in, take care of the wounded, and call a council of war, 8 hours only were allowed, in which all the garison, almost dead thro' the fatigue of having been upon the several duty for 30 hours together, hasten'd on a capitulation.

The French leave 8 battalions in the island, and Guiscard is returned with the rest to Toulon. The English garison know that the designs of the French against Minorca, their actual landing on the island on the 18th of April, the small number of troops in garison, and the small quantity of provisions and stores in the fort, could not be unknown in England: they knew that in former wars a very strong fleet had always been kept in the Mediterranean; and yet every morning's light presented to them a French fleet in quiet possession of the empire of that sea, riding in triumph off the harbour, and convoys of fresh provisions, artillery, &c. arriving at the besiegers camp, as undisturbed by any British cruisers. Under all these discouragements, and greater discouragements they could have, without any fresh support for body or mind, they held out 39 days after they were informed that Byng had abandoned them, till they had not troops enough left to man the works without being oftener on duty than human nature could bear; and till they had expended the charge of their mines upon their artillery.

It is reported that Capt. How, of the Dunkirk, a 60 gun ship, in conjunction with 3 other small ships of war, have taken the island of Bas, off Rochelle.

Brussels, July 12. By our accounts from Paris, Fort St. Philip, after having undergone great difficulties for want of ammunition and provisions, was obliged to capitulate the 29th of June, and the garison, who marched out with all the military honours, were to be carried to Gibraltar.
